Hemostasis is the principal mechanism by which blood remains in its fluid state and prevents blood loss from the vascular system. In case of injury to blood vessels, the circulating blood coagulates or “clots,” thus preventing loss of blood through the circulatory system. Hemostasis, which occurs in all mammals, additionally has the effect of sealing vessels and, by reducing blood loss, reduces the risk of infection and tissue damage. See Goodfellow et al, Br. J. Anaesth. 90:383-393 (2003). Many clinical disorders, such as vascular and non-vascular, result in the need to induce or reestablish hemostasis. Some diseases or conditions affect the coagulation cascade, including hemophilia and autoimmune thrombocytopenic purpura. Hemophilia is a common bleeding disorder in which the lack of or malfunction of blood coagulation factors leads to blood losses or blood coagulation that is slow or ineffective. Hemophilia A is the most common type of hemophilia, and it is caused by a deficiency or absence of Factor VIII activity. Currently, patients with hemophilia are treated with Factor VIII replacement. Autoimmune thrombocytopenic purpura (AITP) is a potentially fatal condition characterized by thrombocytopenia, the chronic low platelet count, increased bleeding time and the presence of an autoantibody in the blood. AITP is autoimmune in nature and is commonly precipitated by an infectious disease, most commonly viral
