The study of hematopoietic cell regulation requires accurate measurements of plasma hormone concentrations, yet assays of gonadotropins by radioimmunoassay (RIA) have shown inconsistent results in terms of their magnitude and persistence. To address these problems, we have undertaken a study of the performance characteristics of an ELISA that can be used for the study of (1) the wide variation of plasma hormone concentrations and (2) the binding of gonadotropin to their respective antigens. This ELISA employs a sheep anti-human follicle-stimulating hormone (FSH) RIA as an additional capture antigen for FSH bound to its antigen in human plasma samples and as the indicator antigen for standard FSH curves. Using this method, we show that the immunoactivity of human FSH in the assay is equivalent to 75% of the known biological activity, which appears to be due to a specific molecular form. Thus, the assay is capable of measuring the true biological activity of FSH with greater accuracy than those assays that measure only the immunoactivity of the hormone. The use of a sequential immunoassay procedure is essential for accurate measurement, which permits more definitive conclusions than may be possible with
